A Double Dose of the Holy Ghost: Barry's Recovery Story

Craig Robertson: All right look, I was a big fan of this TV show called Cheers that ran from 1982 to 1993, and there was a popular spinoff called Frazier. And the fictional main character was a Harvard-educated psychiatrist, who had his own radio show, where people with mental health issues would call in, and Frazier would help solve their problems.

His catchphrase was, "I'm listening." Believe it or not, this show was still running after I became an attorney, and I always imagined as I got into doing divorce work that a call-in radio show would be so entertaining. But fast forward to the popularization of podcasts, and in 2019 when Matt and I were ready to start our own show.

So, I'm gonna do it yourself kind of guy. So I bought a hundred-dollar Yeti microphone, and I did a few test runs using the Garageband app on my computer. And I'll be honest, I was quickly overwhelmed at the time, skill, concentration, and energy that it took to create something, and I was just not proud of what I was able to put together. I did not think it represented the professionalism that our clients expect from us. Whether you need a fantastic editor, a partner in production, and a custom sound designer like us, a turnkey solution that integrates with your marketing strategy, reach out to Casey and Blue Sky to see how they can partner with you to bring your podcast idea to life. In the show notes, we have a link to a free guide. If you want to learn more about what they do or you can visit them online at blueskypodcasting.com.

Adam Black: It's a challenging time to be buying or selling a house in Mississippi especially if you're in a life transition like divorce. Home prices are on the rise and so are interest rates. More than ever before having a creative professional who will take a customized approach to your unique lending needs is critically important.

My name is Adam Black, and I'm a senior mortgage specialist with First Commercial Bank. While my team and I handle every facet of residential mortgages, including lot acquisition, construction, purchase, and refinance, I hold the exclusive designation of real estate collaboration specialist with a focus on divorce mortgage management. My team and I help our clients and their attorneys using our specialized knowledge to not only assemble their
